THE SUNSET ISLE. When the sun is setting golden,

Staining all the sky cround him, Purple, ruby, amethyst; When his glories burn to brightly,

Setting crimson in the west,

E'er he vanishes from sight, That the forest stands transfigured, in the splendor of the light:

Then I seek with hurried footsteps, Once ugain the river's side, Gazing with an eager longing, Far norms it's glassy tide, Where its waters like a crescent,

Curving far into the land, Seem to meet the blue above them,

Hiding all the further strand. Rising alonly from its bosom. Gleaming rosy through the mist;

Lies a tree embowered island. Which the parting run has kissed; Graceful forms are flitting lightly, "Neath the ever waving trees; Liquid tones of sweetest intule,

Flutter to me on the breeze. And they call to me in accents I have heard in days of yere. Ere they weight the spirit mansions,

Elen thur present the spirit shure; And I still my pulsa's throbbing, Legt I has some procious word; And I chide the murmuring waters, By a paralog raphyr stared.

And they becken to me femily, Beck in each with shining band; But the fast of living merial,

May not press that mystic strand. When the crimson despens parple, And the purple pales to gray, Then the white mist gathers thickly, And the bland fades away.

Never eves but mine have seen it, Never cars but miss have heard Thomself tones, whose liquid musle,

Living memories have starred. And my heart has been kept tender. Softened by the buly smile Of the angel ones at evening Gathered on the Sunset Isle.
